

Congresswoman Louise Slaughter (NY-28) touted the passage of a sweeping new financial modernization package in the aftermath of the worst economic crisis since the Great Depression.

“Western New Yorkers are rightly worried about rebuilding our devastated economy and ending the perverse notion of ‘too big to fail,’” said Slaughter. “We’ve all felt the effects of rising unemployment and decreasing wages. This is important legislation that tilts the financial playing field back in favor of consumers, taxpayers, and Main Street after years of recklessness, greed, and excess on Wall Street.”

The Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act prevents the type of catastrophic collapse that plunged our economy into the recession we are still recovering from. It does this by addressing the core causes of the meltdown, holding Wall Street accountable, ending taxpayer-funded bailouts, and protecting Americans from the predatory lending practices.

A new Consumer Financial Protection Agency to protect families and small businesses by ensuring that bank loans, mortgages, and credit cards are fair, affordable, understandable, and transparent. This new independent federal agency will be solely devoted to streamlining oversight and protect Americans from unfair and abusive financial products and services.

It also establishes a responsible and orderly process to shut down financial firms that are “too big to fail” before their risky behavior can threaten the entire economy. These new procedures to dismantle failing companies that pose economy-wide risk – paid for by the financial industry and not the taxpayers – put an end to the idea of “too big to fail” and bailouts.

“I’m pleased that we are taking action to end taxpayer bailouts, waste, fraud and abuse in the financial industry once and for all,” said Slaughter. “It is vital that we get back to the business of rebuilding our shaken economy. This legislation puts in the proper framework we need to make sure that the rebuilding process is sustainable and puts middle class interests before the interests of big banks.”

In addition to implementing rules that responsibly unwind runaway financial institutions, the Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act reins in banks by:

- Including a strong “Volcker rule” that generally restricts large financial firms with commercial banking operations from trading in speculative investments;
- Regulating, for the first time ever, the $600 trillion over-the-counter (OTC) derivatives marketplace;

- Ending abusive predatory lending practices that occurred during the subprime lending frenzy;
- Increasing enforcement power and funding for the Securities and Exchange Commission, including requiring registration of hedge funds and private equity funds;
- And enhancing oversight and transparency for credit rating agencies, whose seal of approval gave way to excessively risky practices that led to a financial collapse.

“Rebuilding our economy is my top priority and it needs to work for Western New Yorkers not a few on Wall Street,” said Slaughter.
